From the Editor's Desk

The autumn brings about the beginning of a new season of karate training in many SWKKF dojos. It is also the time of year when the majority of new students begin their training in karate. Ultimately, many new students will discontinue karate training, and only a small percentage will make the sport a "lifetime" activity. I have spoken with many instructors through the years who have been disappointed with student retention rates in their classes. The obvious question that should arise from such a discussion is, "What can we do about it?" I include a few suggestions here. Some of this information comes from the National Coaching Certification Program Competition A manual.

1) Cut yourself a break

Remember that a certain number of people will discontinue your class regardless of what you do, and it isn't your fault! The general public often has misperceptions regarding the nature of karate practice, because the majority of people have had little exposure to karate. In contrast, parents enrolling their children in more "mainstream" sports have a very clear idea of what the activity is like. Therefore, some people will quit simply because the training is not at all what they thought it would be.

2) Make karate fun

In any new sport, athletes must spend a lot of time acquiring new skills. At this time, fundamental movements are repeated until they become innate. To avoid boredom, strive to teach basics in a way that avoids countless repetitions in the same position. Instead, develop games and drills that develop the required skills.

3) Account for different learning abilities

A seven to eight year-old child's attention span lasts only for a few minutes. They learn best by watching a quick demonstration, followed by trying the activity. An adult may learn better if the techniques are described in more detail.

4) Account for different physical abilities

Very young children have low endurance and limited co-ordination. Don't attempt to strive for technical perfection too early. Instead, focus on developing the general movements first. Sedentary adults should be encouraged to develop fitness in order to prevent injury and to eventually perform at a higher level.

5) Don't be too predictable

Workouts are more fun when the structure of the class varies. It might seem logical to start every class with basics, followed by kata, and conclude with kumite, but this can become tiresome for students. Don't be afraid to "mix it up" a little bit.

6) Use partner drills wherever possible

Practicing techniques with a partner is more stimulating than throwing punches into empty air. After the student has acquired a basic understanding of how a technique is performed, he should practice it with a partner. This approach helps to develop the senses of distancing and timing that are so important in kumite.

7) Encourage homework

In my dojo, I encourage students to cross-train. A personal trainer is a great asset to assist with physical improvement. In addition, students can watch the kata videos to improve a previously-learned kata.

8) Keep it simple

Instructions, descriptions, and corrections should be as brief as possible. Also, keep technical practice as simple as possible. There is no need to have students moving down the dojo floor performing repetitions involving multiple movements.

9) Praise your athletes

Everyone likes to get a pat on the back when they have done something well. Find something good to say about each athlete during the course of a class.

In closing, I will leave you with a list of reasons why children quit sports.

- 1) I lost interest
- 2) I was not having fun
- 3) It took too much time
- 4) Coach was a poor teacher
- 5) Too much pressure (worry)
- 6) I wanted a non-sport activity
- 7) I was tired of it
- 8) I needed more study time
- 9) Coach played favorites
- 10) Sport was boring
- 11) Overemphasis on winning

I wish you all the best in the upcoming season!

INTERVIEW WITH SENSEI RICK LEVIELLE

Editor's note: In October of 1997 I travelled to Delhi, Ontario, to participate in the tournament and workshops there. We performed two-step kumite drills, periodically switching partners. We were asked to change partners one last time, and I was paired with a blackbelt that was somewhat older and smaller than I was. We were instructed to perform jiyu kumite. I initially attacked with a measured pace, and my partner countered easily. I attacked with more vigor, and was repelled once again. I then attacked with everything I had, aggressively stepping forward with punches and kicks. On most of the exchanges, my partner neatly blocked and countered as easily as if I were a child. He then put up his hands to signal me to stop, and said, "OK, let me tell you what you're doing wrong." This was my introduction to Sensei Rick Leveille.

In this "interview" with Sensei Rick I have changed the format slightly. When provided with a list of interview questions by email, Sensei Rick did a fine job of writing a short autobiography and provides a beautiful insight into his philosophical view of the martial arts. I saw little need to edit his words. Enjoy.

Hello fellow karateka:

My name is Rick Leveille. I am a "Sensei" of Wado-Kai Karate for the Shintani Karate Federation. Sensei Jeff Gervin has graciously asked me to introduce some personal and karate history to our members.

I have been practicing and teaching Wado-Kai Karate under the guidance and teaching of Sensei Shintani since 1973. I hold the rank of Shichidan (7th Dan) in the Shintani Karate Federation and am a member of the Shintani Senate whose purpose is to give direction to our members and protect the teachings and philosophy of our founder, Sensei Masaru Shintani.

I have recently moved to Elkford, B.C., and work for Elk Valley Coal Corporation as a rock truck driver in one of their coalmines. My hometown is Wawa, Ontario, where I began my karate practice. I have lived in White River, Ontario for the past 30 years, raising three daughters with my wife, Laurie. I have been teaching karate in White River, along but if you consider that working people who have jobs and families and other responsibilities have done all of the work to achieve our goals, I think that we have done a fine job. I look at karate training not as a sport but as a lifestyle and method of character development. I look at progress and change in our federation as a maturing process much like life in a family. The majority of our members are family oriented and those values are reflected in our philosophy and interactions. As our leaders are maturing, I would like them to focus on the youth and the importance of motivation for these members. It is common for long time members to forget that we have developed our skills slowly over the years and sometimes forget just how far we've come. Take the initiative to show these young karateka what we can do and give them some of the passion that with my friend and student Sensei Brad Lundquist (Godan), since 1978. My parents, I'm proud to say, are both Tai-Chi instructors in Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario. They began Tai-Chi practice after retiring and are very active members in their own organization.

I have enjoyed has driven us so far.

At this time in my karate practice, my focus is not solely on technical skills and achievement such as competitive success and progress in rank but more importantly in the spirit of the journey. I enjoy a good fight and still like to perform for many hobbies and sports over the years such as hockey, skiing (both cross country and downhill), fishing (which remains one of my biggest passions), hunting, mountain biking, and photography. I occasionally play the guitar.

I am not actively teaching karate at this time as we are adjusting to a new life in the west, but I hope to be involved in karate events whenever possible. I'm looking forward to visits to clubs in this region once we are settled. I'm very proud of our accomplishments as an organization and the fact that it has been done through the dedication and volunteer efforts of all of our members. Some may think that change comes slowly to our organization our students. I have sparred with all of my own students on a regular basis over the years and still enjoy sharing my spirit with them in that way. The spirit of true karate is my main focus and it has always been in my approach to all aspects of training. If a karateka practices the spirit of karate, everything else will fall into place. Patience is the key to success. It isn't always easy to progress in activities that we pursue in life, whether it's karate or school or work, but karate practice gives us the tools we need to reach our goals. The key is to attack with spirit. Whenever you meet a new member, give them some of your spirit and watch them grow.

“Take the initiative to show these young karateka what we can do and give them some of the passion that has driven us so far”

Editor's note: I sent an email to Sensei Blakemore to ask him to explain the significance of this meeting. He replied with the following:

This meeting report is to show our population that a committee dedicated to helping Shintani sensei with his organization was in place prior to the Senate, and shows who was on the committee at that time. This committee was a precursor to the present Senate, from which the Senate evolved with Sensei's approval. This type of information has been and is being collected and archived for the future. Anyone having this type or any type of information about the development of the SWKKF from the early days to the present across Canada and the USA are invited to submit what they have for documentation for the history of the organization to the archive committee under the direction of Sensei Denis and me. Photos, letters, and documents of any kind are acceptable. Copies of the above are acceptable from the original item. I hope this report will spark interest in this endeavor from our population so this important work can be done before it is lost.

Sensei Blakemore.

SELF-DEFENSE IN SIXTY SECONDS

Thai pad training drill

By Jeff Gervin, Godan, and Members of Synthesis Martial Arts Dojo, Boissevain, Manitoba.

Training to improve hitting power is essential for the karateka interested in developing skill in self-defense. This drill not only accomplishes this, but also taxes the anaerobic lactic system, which improves the specific type of stamina required for self-defense, kata, or kumite.

Although several different types of pads could be adapted for use in this drill, the thai kickboxing pads pictured are ideal (1). These pads can absorb a good deal of impact, and are sufficiently dense to provide a realistic striking “feel”. The arm pads are strapped to the trainer’s forearms and cover from knuckles to elbow. The pads must not be strapped too tightly in order to allow the trainer to rotate the pads slightly to absorb blows from different angles. The belly pad is fastened tightly around the trainer’s midsection, and safely absorbs mae-geri kicks. Note, however, that the belly pad is very dense, and a certain amount of the force of the kick is transmitted to the wearer; therefore, these pads may not be appropriate for absorption of hard thrusting kicks such as yoko-geri kekomi.

In figure 2, Ed and I are in the ready position to begin the drill. I throw a hard mikazuki-geri to the arm pads, striving for maximum impact. To absorb the force of the blow, Ed thrusts the pads slightly downward to “meet” my kick. Ed needs to “ki down” here to prevent being pushed backwards. I try to make contact with both pads simultaneously; I strike the near (right) pad with the area of my shin just below the knee, and I hit the far (left) pad with my lower shin. I try to avoid striking the pads with the top of my foot to avoid injury. I then throw two more kicks with the right leg, rechambering as quickly as possible each time.

After I have thrown the three mikazuki-geri kicks, Ed switches his stance to present the pads for my left leg (figure 4). I throw three left mikazuki-geri kicks as powerfully and quickly as possible.

Note that the kicks thrown could be mawashi-geri instead of mikazuki-geri. For mawashi-geri, the trainer must hold his pads in a more upright fashion, making it more difficult for him to absorb the kick.

At this time I have thrown a total of six kicks. Ed now presents the arm pads for punching. I begin by throwing right gyaku-zuki to the right arm pad. By throwing the right punch to the right arm pad, I must twist fully into the punch (figure 5). I then immediately twist to my right to deliver my left punch into the left arm pad (6). After the left punch, I throw the right punch again, going back and forth until I have thrown eight hard punches on each side. It is very important for Ed to “catch” my punches by driving the pads forward slightly. If he does not, the pads will fly backward and make the drill ineffective. It is crucial to have adequate wrist support and padding over the knuckles when doing this drill. I use mixed-martial arts training gloves for this purpose. Alternatively, one could use boxing-style hand wraps.

After completion of the punches, I begin throwing mae-geri kicks to the belly pad (7). I throw one left kick (7), followed by one right kick (8). I then repeat until three mae-geri kicks have been delivered with each leg. The trainer must tense his abdomen during impact to accept the blow.

Finishing the mae-geri kicks concludes the first “round” of our drill. The trainer then prepares for the second round by adopting the ready position in figure 2, and the athlete repeats the entire kick-punch-kick sequence. If the athlete can complete three rounds using full power and good form, he is in great shape; if he can do six rounds, he is an animal!

Once again, the entire sequence is:

- 3 x right mikazuki-geri or mawashi-geri
- 3x left mikazuki-geri or mawashi-geri
- 16 zuki alternating left and right
- 6x mae-geri alternating left and right

Repeat two more rounds

IMPORTANT NOTES: When striking thai pads (or any other pad, for that matter), go slowly at first to allow yourself and your trainer to become accustomed to the feel of the pads. Once you are confident, try some harder strikes. Be aware that throwing multiple full-power strikes as described is extremely taxing, so don't overdo it!
